This is the code that I have and it works when I hard code the values in like this: $interval(function(){ $scope.getDateRange(); },10000); but the problem is that I need to load the data into the function that I am using via $http. I tried using the following code but it doesnt work as intended: $interval(function() { $http.get('/someurl').then(function(response) { $scope.dateRange = response.data; }); },10000); I am using NodeJS as the server side platform and ExpressJS on the front end. Any ideas as to what might be going on? A: Use a promise. var interval = $interval(function() { console.log('tick'); $scope.dateRange = {}; }, 10000); $http.get('/someurl').then(function(response) { $scope.dateRange = response.data; console.log('promise resolved'); interval.cancel(); }, function(errorResponse) { console.log('promise rejected', errorResponse); interval.cancel(); }); // Cancel the interval interval.cancel(); A: $interval is a utility service created by angular for common tasks like polling a backend and updating the view. If 2d92ce491b
