Effect of memory impairment on the functional connectivity of the default mode network in older adults. The default mode network (DMN) plays a role in memory and attention in young adults. However, the effect of memory impairment on the functional connectivity (FC) of the DMN in older adults has not yet been addressed. To test the hypothesis that memory impairment has a negative impact on the functional connectivity of the DMN, independent component analysis was used to identify the DMN and eight sub-networks in 34 normal control subjects and 24 older adults with different levels of memory impairment, including 9 with mild impairment, 8 with moderate impairment, and 7 with severe impairment. The different sub-networks of the DMN were compared in terms of their similarities and differences and the correlation between the sub-network similarity and memory performance was analyzed. Our results showed that the DMN was divided into two sub-networks (dorsal and ventral) and that the functional connectivity of the dorsal DMN was significantly decreased in older adults with memory impairment. Furthermore, a significant negative correlation was observed between the FC of the dorsal DMN and memory performance. These findings suggest that the FC of the DMN in the brain of older adults is negatively affected by memory impairment and the decreased FC may be used as a marker for assessing the level of memory impairment. There are very few persons in this country, who have the privilege of being called by the name of the King of the Jews. I have a right to be called so, because my name is Caesar, Emperor of the Romans.
