I used WinAPI FindFirstChangeNotification to find the folder and then GetFileSize to find the total number of photos in the folder. But, I noticed that FindFirstChangeNotification takes about 2.5-3 seconds to get the results. In my case, I need to know the total number of photos as soon as possible (less than 1 second). I tried GetFileSizeEx function, but it doesn't take less than 6 seconds in my case (from the time I clicked the button to receive the results). Does anybody know how to do it? It is impossible to count the number of files in an arbitrary folder without potentially reading all the files in the folder. The only way to know the number of files in a folder is to read all the files in the folder, and count them. If that's not an option, you should tell us what you're trying to do and why. If you don't have a valid reason, then I can only assume that you're trying to cheat. Explanatory Model of Access to Public Spaces in a Mixed-use Neighborhood. Both through direct observation and structured interviews, the authors investigated how public space within a mixed-use neighborhood is accessed by residents. The authors did not find evidence of a consistent or even coherent urban design across the neighborhood. The observed use of public space was a function of the value residents placed on it and their knowledge of where and how to get there. Even residents who lived on the same street often used the different spaces of the same block differently. This study contributes to the urban planning literature on public space by describing the creation of a space through negotiation among space users.
