vlookup, offset, index and other mathematical functions, the vlookup() function is an SQL-based function for working with data. Its purpose is to insert an output value into a cell. A table set up with a unique key and vlookup value as the lookup value, and a reference range or single cell with the resulting value. Here are some examples: A1

=VLOOKUP(D7, Range("A1:B14"),2,FALSE)

A1:A5

=VLOOKUP(D7,Range("A1:B14"),2,FALSE)

A1:B5

=VLOOKUP(D7,Range("A1:B14"),3,FALSE)

The Vlookup function can be used for a range, a single cell, or a row or column specified as variables. Limitations & Restrictions: Vlookup() refers to a cell in which to find the value. In this context, this refers to the second or third position of a range of cells; thus the first position, that is the lookup cell, must have a formula that retrieves a value from the range. Sometimes, you need to query cell A1 but you need to do it from cell B1 or vice versa. It would be much easier to reference cells B1 and A1, respectively, but this would mess up the formula's reference cell. Hence, using a formula that takes the row position, you might consider calculating the column position in addition to the row position (in this case, the row position calculation will be the same as the one for the column position). A single cell can not be one of the parameters specified. You must use a range that must have a unique key (ID in a table) so that the function knows how to get the right value for each row. 09e8f5149f
