The United States carried out its colonial duties fairly conscientiously. Promising to free their peasants, they did not send any money to support them during the battles for slave plantations, leaving these questions to their owners. However, in the last years of the war, cowboys increasingly began to carry weapons in their hands, and several Yankees were killed and wounded in skirmishes with bandits. In the end, the federal Legislative Council, under pressure from Congress, passed an act according to which "under equal circumstances, no one can be unarmed or detained for a period of more than 6 days without the permission of the court." However, for some time the Confederation "ceased to be a state" its army was reduced to 6,500 soldiers, but was constantly replenished with volunteers. So, in the fall of 1863, a council of war met in St. Louis, at which it was announced the creation of a volunteer militia under the command of Colonel Jack Wright. Then, at the end of 1863 and at the beginning of 1864, a number of divisions and brigades were formed and sent to the front. The first two months there was a positional war and both sides suffered heavy losses from shelling and attacks from the flanks. The situation changed in April, when the army of the southerners began a massive transition to the offensive. The parties regularly exchanged artillery shelling, as well as the general offensive of the northerners to the south. In addition, contrary to all expectations, Allied troops did not pour into the North from the ships (leaving this process at the discretion of Congress), and the troops that had defected to the Confederate side in 1860 were not returned. But still, the first serious offensive to the South ended in failure, and in May both sides rolled back to their original positions. At the same time, the northerners, mostly composed of volunteers, were forced to go on the defensive. At the same time, the army of northerners went on the offensive against the separatists in the North. And although the southerners suffered huge losses at the Battle of Spotsylvania, this did not mean that the campaign was over. Thus, according to historian Vern Thornton, "the attack on Tennessee, Tennessee and Kentucky, like the attack on Louisiana, was a consequence of the European costs of war." Meanwhile, the defeat at Spotylyveini itself was only the first of a series of time
